A year ago, the big thing to happen on Twitter was the launch of SMS. It was a way for people to communicate more directly and more personally. It started as a product only for the United States, but Twitter stepped up in the last year and launched SMS globally. Twitter started as a web interface for reading tweets, but SMS made the features more accessible to everyone. For example, Apple pulled an iPhone update because there was a bug that made it possible for the built-in SMS app to intercept your SMS messages to see what you had been typing. Twitter saw this as a great opportunity and came up with an in-app solution. Twitter then launched an interface that would allow iPhone users to use SMS as the Twitter way to receive messages. Now, last fall, Twitter announced a new application called Tweeple that offers SMS as one of its communication methods. In other words, it's the Twitter equivalent of SMS. Tweeple is a communications application for Twitter that allows you to send real-time SMS messages to people who follow you, be notified of new Tweets when you have certain new followers, send text messages to twitter accounts, and control the Twitter Mobile application. It supports both traditional SMS and Twitter's new feature called Twitter Direct Messages. Here's what Tweeple is all about: SMS for Twitter SMS for Twitter allows you to send both text and multimedia messages to people who follow you. Text messages could be updates on your Twitter account, a personal message, or could be a simple acknowledgement for someone's message. Multimedia messages are videos and photos. You could also get your Tweeple account notifications via SMS (it's not just for Twitter users). For example, you could get an automatic notification when someone mentions you in a Tweet, send a message to people you follow with an update on a topic, or send a direct message.

The Bottom Line: We can't count on the government for patching up vulnerabilities, which is why we turned to indie hackers. Since the independent developers make programs for a living, they have no financial or political incentive to write crappy software. Plus, the people creating these applications are typically forced to share their creations with the public, so they don't have the ability to charge big money for their talents. A few of these programs are free, but they are generally more feature-limited than paid apps. Some of the best home security programs also come from non-major developers, so you can expect very high quality when you pay for a premium version.
